

LIBRARY FREEDOM PROJECT

WHAT IS LFP?

Library Freedom Project is rethinking the library professional organization by creating a network of values-driven librarians working together to build information democracy.

WHAT WE DO

We are an organization of library professionals collaborating towards library ethics in practice.

We provide professional development on topics like privacy basics, understanding artificial intelligence, and intellectual freedom defense.

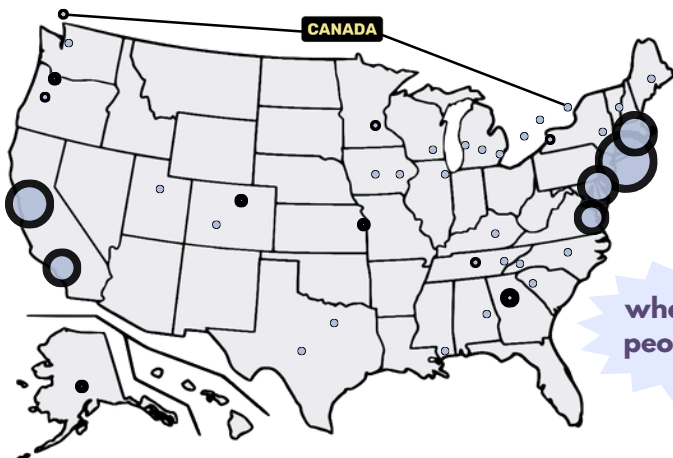

We create community spaces for library workers to collaborate, strategize, learn, and build community.

We offer trainings to groups of all sizes—from single libraries to consortia and major conferences.

We create free resources for education and professional development, like toolkits, bookmarks, and flyers.

WE ARE A COMMUNITY OF PRACTICE

We provide library workers with skills to build information democracy in our libraries. Information democracy means:

- promoting equity of access to information
- helping people seek information without surveillance
- addressing the power dynamics of information
- putting information in the hands of the people

We work collaboratively through a network of librarians across the United States and Canada, and we are always expanding to grow our membership.

We believe in the combined power of long-term organizing and short-term harm reduction.
